QUIT-RENTS FOR THE KING.

They Can Not Break Away From Customs in England.

The quit-rent services due the Crown by the Corporation of the City of London were rendered the other day with all formality of a practice which has lasted now for 700 years. The ceremony is associated in the popular mind with the cutting of fagots in connection with a piece of waste ground called the Moors in the County of Salop, and with the counting of horse-shoes and horse-nails in respect of a forgo in the Parish of St. Clement Danes.

There is a legend in the Exchequer Office that Henry III, being present at a great tilting match held by the Knights Templars on land where the embankment now stands, noticed an itinerant blacksmith who had set up his booth there. The blacksmith distinguished himself during the tournament by his readiness in repairing the armor of the combatants and in re-shoeing their horses, and the King was so pleased with his activity that he granted to him the piece of land on which his temporary booth had been erected, on condition that he made six horse-shoes and sixty horse-nails every year. The other quit-rent was in respect of a piece of land in Shropshire covered with underwood, the quit-rent service of which was the presentation of two "knives," one blunt and the other sharp. The bill-hook was blunt and the hatchet was sharp. The grantee had to present these instruments to the King and cut up a couple of fagots.

A lease is recalled under which, in addition to the regular payment of rent, those brought to this county invariably dying in a short time from starvation, none of their keepers being able to persuade them to partake of food. In recent years, however, the keepers have been more successful, and at the present time there are an even dozen of them in captivity. Of the ten pups brought to this country recently from St. Paul Island, Alaska, by the United States revenue cutter Bear, two are now in the National Zoological park, two are in the New York city aquarium and two are in the care of Trevor Kincaid, professor of zoology in the University of Washington, at Seattle.

There were already two pups in the bureau of fisheries' pool, so that this addition doubles the number there. All told, there are now eight of these lively youngsters sojourning at the National Capital.

Although they have now been away from their far Northwest habitat for a number of months, the pups are in a healthy condition and enjoying their captivity. The bureau of fisheries arranged with Boutwell Thubert, of the Bear, to bring over the present shipment of ten pups, which he did in a very successful manner.

The eight pups brought East are now over 3 months old. The male in the bureau of fisheries weighed 27 pounds and

For a long time it was supposed that fur seals could not be kept in captivity, those brought to this county invariably dying in a short time from starvation, none of their keepers being able to persuade them to partake of food. The eight pups brought East are now over 3 months old. The male in the bureau of fisheries weighed 27 pounds and the female 19½ pounds. They are fed twice a day—in the morning between 7 and 8 o'clock and in the afternoon between 2 and 3 o'clock. Their diet is fresh fish, usually gray sea trout, and sometimes spotted sea trout, which they take eagerly, each eating from 5 to 8 pounds daily.

Their favorite pastime is to swim around the large pool in which they are kept, sometimes with incredible rapidity, often jumping like porpoises, and splashing water on unsuspecting visitors. They circle about the pool, always turning to the right with the hands of the clock. Immediately after feeding they begin scratching and rubbing themselves, a sort of massage which doubtless aids digestion.—Washington Post.
